Subject: A short intro to who I am and what I bring

Dear Ms. Tibayan and Ms. Alarcon

You asked me what was motivating my interest in consulting and whether I was interested in a data engineering role: This would be a resounding yes, especially when combined with the field of data analytics, because for me personally tasks like cleaning and transforming, automating things and running some kind of analyses on the final product was honestly much more of a fun and fulfilling and more attuned to who I am as an individual. Those SQL transformations? Yes, these little things are what give the things I do meaning. And I hope I can apply this level of passion to the domain of consulting given the testimonies given by the clients your company has come across and based on the positive feedback I've heard from our good mutual colleagues.

In all honesty I actually aspired to become a machine learning engineer right after graduation, however through time and some personal projects I found that it didn't give me the same fulfillment as when I focused more so to data analytics and engineering, when I focused more on moving data from one place to another and then doing some sort of analyses on it. That being said the process of feature engineering was always something I enjoyed doing, and the preparation of data before training an ML model on it, and I realized I could use this foundational knowledge of data science and machine learning I had picked up in my undergraduate as a stepping stone towards analytics and engineering.

So, the main thing that drove me to be specialize more in data analytics and engineering was the fact that this seemed to me a much more fulfilling role. And because I found Z-Lift's circle of professionals like you and Ms. Alarcon to be people I could learn more from for this field I thought it best to shoot my shot and try offer the best I have when it comes to this, although I myself am in the continuous path of learning and growing. Because I am rather driven to give value to my workplace, I just need an outlet, a chance perhaps in being able to do so. These are the values I think I have come to make of Z-Lift solutions. And I hope to honestly be a part of it.

Thank you and Best Regards,

Larry
